How to see Montreal

ONTREAL, the ancient home of the Huron warrior; the centre of conflict in the great wars for sovereignty over Canada between France and England, is now, with its population of 350,000, the great metropolis of the Dominion, where French and English jostle each other in friendly rivalry, and yet stand united, shoulder to shoulder, for progress, development, and the general welfare. Montreal offers to visitors numerous spots of interest, historic and legendary, as well as modern and artistic. The city, which is at the head of ocean navigation, is beautifully and massively built, mostly of limestone. It is the great distributing point of the world's shipments to Canada, the storehouse for the enormous agricultural output of the country, and the Canadian centre of higher education.

The selection of the hotel at which you will stay is most important, as on your physical comfort will depend, in a great measure, your enjoyment of the visit. The well-known St. James Hotel has recently undergone extensive alterations and improvements, which place it on a par with the leading hotels in Canada. The latest system of steam-heat and electric light has been installed throughout, also electric elevator and fire-escape on each floor. It is to-day one of Montreal's most modern hotels. It is conducted on the most liberal basis as to cuisine, and the comfort and needs of its patrons are well looked after. The location is unsurpassed, and the house is a cool, comfortable, home-like tourist's rest.

Place Viger Depot.

Visitors will be impressed by the fact that the early history of the United States is indelibly blended with that of Montreal, for it was from this city that many of the strong men of one, two and three centuries ago went forth to discover, to govern, to trade, and to convert. On St. Paul street, just east of Place

Dining Room

Royale, stood the birth-place of Pierre and Jean Baptiste Le Moyne, the men who discovered the mouth of the Mississippi River, in 1699, and founded New Orleans. Between 1666 and 1668, Jacques Marquette, the great Jesuit missionary and discoverer, left the banks of the St. Lawrence on his voyage of discovery to the Mississippi.

The Port of Montreal.

At the corner of St. Peter and St. Paul streets stood the residence of Robert Cavalier, Sieur de La Salle. It was in 1666 that La Salle came to Montreal, to go, ten years later, on his voyage of discovery into the North West and thence down to the Gulf of Mexico.

Near the Place d'Armes stood the house of Sieur du Luth, after whom the city of Duluth, in Minnesota is named. On Notre Dame street, just west of St. Lambert Hill, was the residence of La Mothe Cadillac, who founded the now beautiful city of Detroit.

A little tablet at the corner of Notre Dame and St. John streets with the following inscription: "Forretier House. Here General Montgomery resided during the winter of 1775-6,"—reminds us that the city was once in the hands of our southern neighbors.

There are many others places reminding us of this connection, too numerous to be mentioned here.

At the foot of the mountain is the Montreal Aqueduct, the Royal Victoria Hospital and McGill University. This university, which is constantly being added to, should be visited; it faces Sherbrooke street, where may be seen many handsome residences. There are many other very interesting spots to be visited, about which information may be obtained at the office of the hotel.

IN DAYS OF KNIGHTS

The early history of Montreal is so divided between that of England and France

That the visitor often finds it difficult to understand the meaning of her legends and traditions. In the good old Mahogany furniture for which she is justly reputed, the same characteristic may be found. One may find a good old English family jealously guarding rare specimens of Louis XV. or Louis XVI. furniture, and beneath the humble French habitant's roof may be found priceless pieces of the old English "Colonial". ¶ We have spent years in gathering together our assortment of this elegant old Mahogany furniture. Of course we only handle what is really genuine, and it takes both time and money to secure it. We are always pleased to show this collection to visitors to our city, and they are afforded an opportunity at the same time of going through Canada's largest Home Furnishing Emporium. :: :: :: :: ::
